CELEBRATING 37 YEARS OF INDEPENDENCE

Student Government Election

After win, Montell starts transition

Unopposed winner pledges to start work immediately

By Katie Saltz
ksaltz@kykernel.com

The crowd was smaller and quieter than last year, but there was still much celebration yesterday night when Tyler Montell was announced the 2008-09 Student Government president.

Montell and his running mate, Grant Mills, ran unopposed and won with a total of 1,940 votes.

After all of the time and effort spent planning and campaigning, Montell said the moments after the announcement seemed almost unreal to him.

"The responsibility is a bit overwhelming," Montell said. "This is something we've been thinking about for months, and it's here. But as overwhelming as it is, it's encouraging too."

Now that the race is over, Mills said he is ready to get to work as vice president.

"I'm excited for the challenge," Mills said. "This is the first step to make a positive change on campus."

There were more than 20 pages of write-in votes for the election. The leading write-in candidate, Spanish sophomore Peggy Ray, had 229 votes. Mills said he was anxious about the possibility of someone unexpectedly walking away with a presidential victory.

"Even though we ran unopposed, there was still a chance for a write-in," Mills said.

"There are a lot of people on campus qualified for a position like this."

The total number of votes this year was 3,251, 22 votes less than last year despite the ability to vote from any computer for the first time in a spring SG election.

About 2,100 people voted for a presidential candidate compared to last year's number of 3,133. The total number of presidential candidate votes reported included only those for Montell and Ray.

Final results were delayed about one hour because of the volume of write-in votes. The SG

SG president-elect Tyler Montell, left, celebrates with political science sophomore Ben Duncan in the Student Center patio last night. Duncan helped Montell and his running mate, Grant Mills, campaign.

Election Board had to replace the original results as well after only 14 of the 15 senator at-large winners were included.

Only having one presidential candidate definitely affected voter turnout this year, Montell said. But not having competition for the presidential spot put more attention on the senatorial candidates, which Montell said was a great thing.

"Last year the climax of the results was about Nick (Phelps) and Scott (McIntosh)," Montell said. "This year it wasn't about the presidential race. (Senators) are such a hard working body, and it's good to put the emphasis on them."

The referendum on this year's ballot passed by several hundred votes. The referendum asked students if they were in favor of using $2 of student fees to provide free national newspapers, like USA Today or The New York Times, on campus.

Of the 36 senators elected, many have served in the Senate before. At-large-elect and current

Dame must vacate within 90 days

By Rebecca Sweeney
rsweeney@kykernel.com

The Dame, a popular downtown bar and music venue, must be vacated within 90 days to make way for the proposed 40-story hotel development, CentrePoint.

Lexington businessman Joe Rosenberg, who owns The Dame and many other buildings on the block where the hotel is planned, enacted a buyout clause in the business's lease, said Dame general manager Nick Sprouse in an e-mail. The Dame does not "have any choice in this situation," he said.

"I'd still like to see a compromise reached between The Webb Companies (which are heading the development) and those that would like to see the current establishments remain where they are," Sprouse said in the e-mail.

Sprouse added that The Dame would remain open as long as possible and will look for a new location if it is impossible to remain where it is.

Demolition of three other buildings on the Rosenberg Block — located between the corners of West Main and South Upper streets and West Vine and South Limestone streets — have been put on hold for 30 days. After that, some buildings may be destroyed before developers can prove they have the money to redesign Lexington's skyline.

Rosenberg applied for demolition permits for buildings on the block along South Limestone Street Monday.

On Wednesday, the Division of Historic Preservation put a 30-day hold on the demolition permits to determine if any buildings have historical significance.

If the permits are issued after the 30-day hold, the demolition can begin after 24 hours and must be completed within 30 days, said Dewey Crowe, director of the Division of Building Inspection.

The Urban County Council and the Tax-Increment Financing Commission will have to approve the financing before construction of the development can begin, said Dudley Webb, a developer in the project, in a March 5 Kernel story.

Sprouse said he hopes the demolition will not begin until developers prove that they have the financing to complete the project.

The requested permits do not affect The Dame, which is located on West Main Street.

Councilwoman Linda Gorton, who was supportive of CentrePoint when the plans were announced March 4, said she thinks the demolition is beginning too quickly. She would prefer demolition to begin only after developers prove they have enough money to complete the project, she said.

She is also worried about Lexington's cultural center on that block, which besides The Dame is also home to bars Mia's and Buster's.

"Another of my concerns is that we are able to maintain the entertainment venues which people currently enjoy," she said.

Davis' bicentennial eclipsed by Lincoln

By Jill Laster
jlaster@kykernel.com

Over the last few months, celebrations for Abraham Lincoln's 200th birthday have drawn attention to the Kentucky native's life and his legacy as president. But the 200-year anniversary of another Kentucky president's birth, Confederate President Jefferson Davis, is receiving mixed reviews.

"I'll say it this way — winners write history," said Ron Bryant, a Lexington historian writing a book on Davis. "We need heroes, we need villains. Lincoln became a hero and Davis a villain."

Davis was born in what is now Todd County, Ky., in 1808, one year before Lincoln. Davis served as the only president of the 11 southern states that seceded from the Union between 1861 and 1865. The Confederate States of America surrendered in 1865, and Davis was locked in prison the same year.

Despite being denounced by many civil rights groups, signs of Davis' legacy can still be found throughout the state.

In Southwest Kentucky, a structure resembling the Washington Monument stands in memory of Davis. At 351 feet tall, the Jefferson Davis Monument is the fourth largest freestanding obelisk in the world, according to Kentucky State Parks.

Although Kentucky never seceded from the Union, a statue of Davis stands in the rotunda in the state's Capitol building.

A statue of Kentucky-native Jefferson Davis is one of five in the Capitol Rotunda in Frankfort.

"The Civil War is still very much alive in many places," said Cliff Howard, a Jefferson Davis impersonator. "Kentucky was on both sides of the fence. It still is."

Having heard of Kentucky's reputation for "being a little backward," integrated strategic communications senior James Davidson II, was not surprised about Davis' statue in the Capitol building.

Davidson, first-vice president of UK's chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said a statue of Davis leaves a bad impression.

"What is Frankfort saying to the rest of Kentucky with it being there?" Davidson said. "I respect everyone's heritage and Southern tradition, but given the history, I think it shouldn't be there."

The statue of Davis, installed in 1936, is one of five statues in the Capitol building. Lincoln is the largest in the center, and Davis stands in the corner behind his right shoulder. Former Kentucky Congressman Henry Clay, physician and drafter of the state constitution Ephraim McDowell and former Vice President Alben Barkley also stand in the rotunda.

The last time Davis' statue came into debate was 2003, when a coalition of African-American groups protested its presence in the Capitol building. A state advisory committee left the issue up to

City looks for solutions to budget shortfall

By Kelli Long

Mandatory recycling and increased parking meter costs are just two of the proposals Lexington is considering in an effort to streamline spending to make up for an estimated $5 to $7 million revenue shortfall this fiscal year.

The proposed changes were presented after a city audit, performed by Management Partners Inc., made more than 400 recommendations in an effort to make the city's spending more efficient.

There is no record of a city audit since the Lexington and county governments merged in 1974, said Susan Straub, director of government communication.

"The mayor likened it to owning a car with no maintenance for 25 years," Straub said of the audit. "It was time to look under the hood."

One proposed recommendation on improving city efficiency that could affect students living off campus would be mandatory participation in the recycling and yard waste collection program.

Some students said making recycling mandatory would not help motivate people to recycle.

"I don't feel that recycling should be made mandatory," said Sarah Marshall, an agricultural communications senior. "Recycling has already been made available to Lexington residents, and my roommates and I take advantage weekly, but an incentive program that would give us a reward for efforts would push us to try harder."

Rates at parking meters could also be raised, along with the fees to park at city-owned parking garages.

Other money-saving recommendations include the closing of some of the lesser-used city pools, as well as decreasing the number of city-owned cars by nearly 100.

"The mayor likened it to owning a car with no maintenance for 25 years."

SUSAN STRAUB
Lexington spokeswoman on the city's recent audit

The recommended changes would make a relatively small impact on UK because it plays such a positive economic role in the city, said Dick DeCamp, councilman of the third district, which includes UK.

"UK is one of the largest employers in Fayette County, and a major source of revenue for the city," DeCamp said. "Because of the amount of people on UK's payroll and the payroll tax, that equals more money for the urban county government."

The exact amount of the shortfall and the extent of changes that are going to be made will not be known until the budget is presented to the city council by the mayor's office April 8, DeCamp said.

Cats look to sink Midshipmen in weekend tourney

By Kenny Colston
kcolston@kykernel.com

For the past eight years, Navy has dominated the Midwest Regional of the National Collegiate Boxing Association, knocking off perennial runner-up UK every year.

But with three national championship contenders on this year's squad, UK boxing club head coach George Ginter thinks the tide may finally be turning against the Midshipmen, favoring the Cats.

For the second straight year, the UK boxing club is host of the Midwest Regional tournament. Last year, the tournament was held at the Four Seasons off Winchester Road. This year the club has moved the tournament on campus to the Buell Armory.

Fights start tonight and will run through Sunday. With the on-campus location, Ginter hopes students can show up to create a hostile environment for the other teams.

"Since Navy will be there, I think all of the Army ROTC guys are going to show up to make some noise," Ginter said, referring to the athletic rivalry between Army and Navy.

With nine squads comprising the Midwest region, UK will have its hands full with more than just the Midshipmen. Ginter expects Miami (Ohio), West Virginia, North Carolina and The Citadel to all bring quality competition to the tournament.

"Navy's number one," Ginter said. "We're the second best team. Miami will put four guys in, and they can all fight. West Virginia will bring four champions and UNC has one guy."

"We have a legitimate chance for a national champion."

Eager generation of boxers may rejuvenate sport

There was a time when fear reigned within the ring.

When boxing thrived. A time when even the boldest of contenders couldn't escape the punishing punches of a heavyweight champion.

J.D. WILLIAMS
Kernel columnist

Contrary to Walter Cannon's theory, there was never a question about what to do — it's always a fight, never a flight.

But much has changed since the olden days of boxing.

The sport is not as popular as it was 50 years ago. Household names that once dominated the canvas are long gone. The changes have resulted in the decline of one of the most popular sports in America, giving way to the prominence of basketball and football.

The boxing world has gone nearly six years without a figurehead heavyweight, since Lennox Lewis sent from Mike to his knees. For a sport in need of a savior, it must first look at its candidates for athletes who could grow to become boxing legends.

The future of rolling gloves with crowds screaming makes tournaments a vital part of a dying sport's rebirth.

SEC road challenges baseball team

By Matthew George
mgeorge@kykernel.com

UK third baseman Chris McClendon crept past the bag and into the infield grass. As the 5-foot-11-inch junior readied for his pitcher's delivery, a Tiger fan along the third base line, one of more than 2,000 that packed Auburn's Plainsman Park, shouted out.

"You might want to get off the grass!" the fan yelled. "You're not going to get any Miracle Grow to make you any taller!"

McClendon said the heckling was just a taste of the treatment that greeted him during last weekend's series in Auburn. The junior college transfer from Texarkana College had never experienced life on the road in the Southeastern Conference.

But UK head coach John Cohen said that was the type of atmosphere McClendon and the rest of the new players should come to expect when they visit other clubs in the SEC.

"I liken it all the time, because I've been to all these venues so many times, it's like teams coming into Rupp Arena," Cohen said.

"Every college baseball atmosphere in this league is extraordinary," he said. "It's like nothing you've ever seen. Every trip in this league is very volatile from the fans standpoint and when you talk about how many people show up to the games, it's big and you have to get used to it, because you have to be able to play in those kinds of conditions."

The Cats struggled in their first SEC road weekend. After opening the season 19-0, tying the records for best start and longest winning streak in school history, UK dropped two of three to Auburn, barely salvaging a win in Sunday's third game.

Despite the outcome of the series, Cohen said it was important for the Cats to get that first conference road series under their belts.

"It's very important," Cohen said. "Every atmosphere in our league is very similar, and to have already had that atmosphere at Auburn, now going into South Carolina I think it really helps us to have that under our belt."

Sophomore outfielder Troy Frazier said that coming off a 15-game home stand just before the Auburn series made it difficult to adjust to making a road trip.

their respective weight classes.

"We have a legitimate chance for a national champion," Ginter said.

As a former wrestler at Henry Clay High School, Sexton is used to being around a mat, and all that experience inside the wrestling ring has helped two-time All-American improve inside the boxing ropes.

"It absolutely helped," Sexton said. "When I first joined, one of the guys said he hates wrestlers because they pick (boxing) up so easily."

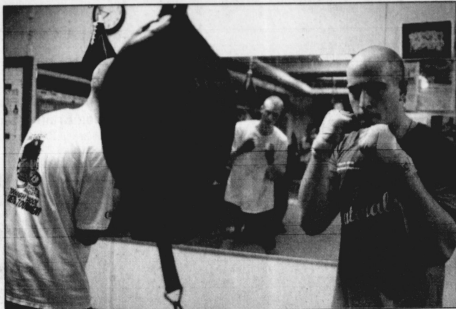

Sexton isn't the only former wrestler on the team. Cornett, who is also Ginter's stepson, wrestled at Henry Clay. In fact, going to Cornett's wrestling matches is where Ginter got his first peep at Sexton.

Of all UK boxers, Cornett has the most experience, Sexton said. Cornett has been boxing since he was 8, giving the freshman experience that even most seniors lack.

"Chris is going to come in and surprise some people," Sexton said.

But if UK has any hope of getting past Navy for the team championship, it's going to have to improve on the last time the two teams got together. Less than a month ago in Louisville, Navy swept the Cats in all six fights during a match. And while the beating still lingers in UK's mind, Sexton says that the Feb. 29 fight was a mismatch.

The premier fight of the regional may be a rematch of the two top fighters at 147 pounds. UK's Cannon and Navy's Antoine prove it.

Along with a couple of boxers expected to contend for a national championship, the club also has a boxer, Meredith Gustina.

A club that once had to search high and low for somewhere to practice is now housing the tournament from which a national champion could emerge, with the likes of Navy bringing in it's top sluggers, along with boxers from Miami (Ohio), West Virginia, North Carolina and The Citadel.

But regardless of where the boxers come from — whether it be Lexington or Annapolis — it's the overall interest in the sport that matters the most.

Getting students interested in boxing wasn't easy for Ginter. A club sport separated from UK's athletic department, the coach faced the hardships of low funding and practicing off campus. But now, four years after moving into Alumni Gym, the boxing club is thriving due to Ginter's dedication to the team.

When funding for the boxing club was low, Ginter dipped into his own pocket to make sure his undergrads had proper training. Dedicated people like UK's boxing coach, along with amateur coaches across the nation, will help inspire a new generation of boxers that can reintroduce the same fear in the ring that was once prominent.

Richards and Curry's on-court fit bolstered by bond off court

By Kevin Cary
 McClatchy Newspapers

DETROIT — Jason Richards doesn't even have to look.

When Davidson's point guard is charging down the basketball court with the ball, he already knows where teammate Stephen Curry will be.

Sunday, Richards threw a no-look pass to the right wing. Curry caught the ball in stride, shot and made an eventual four-point play.

It turned into the pivotal play in Davidson's 74-70 comeback win against Georgetown. The Wildcats will need more of that kind of telepathy when they face Wisconsin on Friday night.

Curry averages 26 points and Richards leads the nation in assists. Yet, the roots of their success stretch beyond the court.

"Their friendship is a big part of the secret," forward Max Paulhus Gosselin said. "That's helped them because they trust each other on and off the court."

The two use a "hand and glove" gesture to signify their value to each other on the court.

Coach Bob McKillop said there's more to it than that.

"It's really genuine," McKillop said Thursday. "That's not just something they did. It has come from the friendship they have built."

If Curry and Richards aren't talking about the competitors on "America's Best Dance Crew," they are heading to Birkdale Village to catch a movie or eat dinner at Outback Steakhouse.

"It's like they are attached at the hip," teammate Bryant Barr said. "You see them at the Student Union, in the library, walking around campus. They are just always talking."

Their trust grew during the winter break. Davidson was 4-6 and Curry was struggling with a wrist injury. He knew where to turn to get going.

"Jason just talked to me and settled me down," Curry said.

Davidson has won 24 straight since then, and Richards continues to motivate his teammate. He implored Curry to shoot more during Davidson's win against Gonzaga last week, telling the sophomore that no one could guard him.

Richards said Curry is easy to talk to, despite his NBA pedigree and success.

"People who get that kind of hype can be so different," Richards said. "But Steph is the most down-to-earth kid. He's a celebrity at Davidson, but he still says hello to everyone. There's more to him than just basketball."

The two share a passion for golf and they aren't afraid to rib each other on the course. Richards is the better player — Curry's tee shots aren't nearly as accurate as his jump shots. Both shoot in the high 70s on a good day, but Richards has beaten Curry in five of six matchups.

Or so he says.

"No, we tied once," Curry said. "He's only got me four times."

The two debated that statistic for a minute, before Curry explained that Richards isn't exactly a sportsman on the course. He'll talk during Curry's backswing or tell a joke about Curry and a girlfriend before a putt. But Richards isn't the only one who can dish out trouble.

If Curry is the king among Davidson basketball players, then Richards is the complementary jack. Put the two together, and you are left with a pair of jokers.

Assistant coach Jim Fox is the primary target.

Curry and Richards are known to sabotage his cell phone address book. They switch their phone numbers with other contacts he has, and then send bogus text messages.

"I think all these beautiful women are in love with me, and then I find out it is just them," Fox said. "You see how they work together on the court? They also work in cahoots to get together to bring me down."

Curry and Richards laugh when told of Fox's frustration. The powerful point guard with the uncanny vision and the shooting guard with the silky jump shot enjoy that, but not as much as playing together on the court.

That time might end Friday night. Wisconsin is favored to end Davidson's 24-game winning streak. Richards, a senior, said the friendship will remain.

"No matter where I go, I know we will still be in touch," he said. "We'll always have that connection."

Jim Carrey voices Horton in "Horton Hears a Who!" a film for kids and adults.

BLUE SKY STUDIOS MCT

Magic of Dr. Seuss captured in film

By Ricky Simpson
rsimpson@kykernel.com

Horton Hears a Who!
Starring Jim Carrey, Steve Carell, Seth Rogan

With a combination of fuzzy little creatures, A-list star power, and the king of children's literature — Dr. Seuss, this 20th Century Fox CGI explosion of cartoon flavor has no choice but to bring in the moolah and make the "Horton" producers as happy as Cindy Lou Who. Of course, that success is only reached if the film captures the themes the great doctor was attempting to convey.

In this childish, yet charming, animated feature, Horton (Carrey) is a ditzzy, jungle-dwelling elephant who teaches a group of young creatures the ways of the wild. Horton soon discovers a strange world living on a speck. An entire world of Whos, including the mayor of Whoville (Carell), who seems to be the only one who notices the strange activities throughout his city, lives on this speck.

Horton and the mayor create a bond as they are the only ones who believe the other world exists. Despite the fact that they cannot see or feel each other, the two still hold the common bond of belief in another world that they once believed could not exist.

A baring theme of this film is the question of faith. Multiple times, the skeptics of the unseen world say, "If you can't see, hear it or feel it, it doesn't exist." In the jungle world, the innocent children are the only ones besides Horton who believe the possibility of something being there that they cannot see. Horton, who believes in something he cannot see or explain, is eventually martyred, caged up and ridiculed for his beliefs as the others feel his beliefs are corrupting the children of the jungle.

Above all Seuss's books, "Horton" has always struck a chord as the most inspirational and morally evolved. The film does an impeccable job of providing these philosophical themes, coupled with the vintage Seuss look.

Of course in the end, the others discover the small world and find that they were wrong to have such little faith, and that even the smallest of specks are important and worth saving. Then comes the classic line: "Don't give up! I believe in you all. A person's a person, no matter how small!"

"Horton" runs 88 minutes and is rated G. It's a film you can watch on a train, a film you can watch in a plane. This is one of the best adaptations of a Seuss book in years and mops up the mess left by "The Cat in the Hat" (2003). If you want a story that will make your heart grow three sizes that day, "Horton" delivers and is worth the pay.

Wild band roars onto campus

By Scarlett Sprigate
fsprigate@kykernel.com

Rock 'n' roll will beat down the door on campus this weekend, and it will be wearing a lion costume.

The Lions Rampant, who usually wear costumes on stage, will headline the Cats Den at 8 p.m. on Friday as part of the Beantnik Ball, a concert series that has spent the last three years bringing UK students and rising rock groups together in a more intimate setting than the typical concert venue.

The Burlington, Ky.-based band found their niche playing "bitest-infused, garage-brewed rock n' roll" in the greater Cincinnati area, said Stuart MacKenzie, singer and guitarist for the band.

"Think John Spencer Blues Explosion, plus The Black Keys and some Mudhoney," he said.

Cincinnati has been quick to show their appreciation for the local boys. The Lions Rampant, which also includes bassist Paul Bunyan and drummer Alex Bauer, were nominated for both Best Rock Band in Cincinnati and New Artist of the Year at the Cincinnati Entertainment Awards last year, and the band was featured as a rising artist in Entertainment Weekly.

Josh Rupp, director of concerts at the Student Activities Board, worked with WRFL General Manager Chuck Clelney and Cats Den event coordinator Rob Theakston to find Beantnik Ball headliners that would cover a variety of genres and styles. Rupp said The Lions Rampant is no exception.

"After hearing their music and talking with the musicians, we were convinced they would be a perfect fit for the series," Rupp said. "Their songs are really upbeat, and I can already imagine the energy that will prevail on stage from simply listening to their music."

MacKenzie said students should look forward to a high-energy show.

"We're going to play some fun music that you can dance to with your friends," he said. "It's going to be dirty and garage-y and definitely a good time. We feed a lot off of the crowd energy, and we try to get the people into it as much as possible."

For those looking for a preview of the show, the band's past performances are available on YouTube (www.youtube.com) by searching for "The Lions Rampant," and the band's second EP, The Lions Rampant Play Rock N Roll, is available for free at their Web site (www.thelionsrampant.com).

Poets to hold discussion about Iraq

By Kelly Wiley
fwiley@kykernel.com

Students will have the opportunity to discuss their views on the War in Iraq this weekend with various poets from around Kentucky.

On Sunday at 7 p.m., Al's Bar will host the free event "Poets for Peace, Five Years in Iraq." Al's Bar is located downtown at 601 North Limestone St.

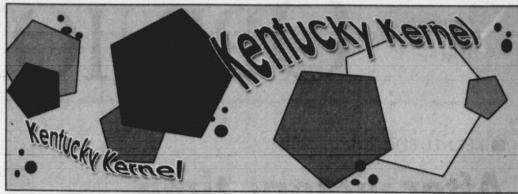

Kentucky native George Ella Lyon and Jane Gentry Vance, the state Poet Laureate and a UK English and honors professor, will perform. Music for the event will be provided by Joy Bombs.

"It's basically some poetry reading and a discussion all centering around the five years that we have now been in Iraq and examining that from multiple angles," said Lester Miller, co-owner of Al's Bar.

This will be an opportunity for students to express their views on the War in Iraq. The discussion has no set topic, but Miller said the poets who are performing will spark the interest of many students.

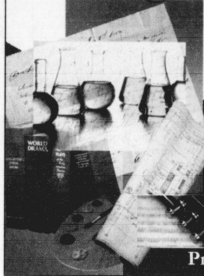

Miller said he hopes students will come and express their views on the war.

The discussion will not be moderated, Miller said, and anyone is free to say what they feel about the war.

After victory, time for Montell to seek input from students

Perhaps congratulations are due to Tyler Montell for seizing the least surprising Student Government presidential victory in recent years. With the common-sense strategy of being the only ticket on the ballot, Montell and running mate Grant Mills soared to victory last night, vanquishing pesky write-in candidates with a whopping vote count of 1,940, 1,711 more than their closest write-in opponent.

Now, Montell and Mills need to lead something that was left out of this one-sided presidential campaign: a true debate about the most pressing issues facing UK students and how SG should respond to them. In a normal campaign, the candidates present competing visions of SG's priorities and methods, and voters get to register their preference. This year, though, voters had no meaningful alternative to Montell's platform — at best, dissatisfied voters could use the write-in slot to give a shout-out to their best friend or favorite "Star Wars" character.

In an interview with the editorial board last week, Montell spoke as if a true campaign would have been a distraction from more important matters, drawing contrasts between the political race and the process of developing a governing agenda.

"The real benefit to students of having only one ticket running is that we've been really proactive in the transition," he said. "We have a month to work on what we would do as president and vice president instead of focusing on the race."

But a competitive campaign would have forced Montell to defend his proposals before the student body — and, more importantly, it would have given a public airing to other points of view. For instance, while we didn't agree with 2007 presidential candidate Scott McIntosh's proposal to eliminate salaries for executive officers, the plan raised awareness about accountability in SG and pushed eventual victor Nick Phelps to develop a response. Although the competition may have distracted the candidates from drawing up final governing agendas, having an open debate ultimately benefited the student body.

Montell's easy path to victory doesn't preclude him from engaging in this sort of public dialogue. He could, for instance, hold an open forum with some of the newly elected senators — especially those who did not run on his "ticket" — to debate what SG's priorities should be and how to achieve them in the coming school year.

Students should not regard Montell as illegitimate simply because he ran unopposed. As we said in our endorsement of him, he is certainly qualified for the job and will take it seriously.

Nevertheless, he won't have much stature or leverage if he doesn't open himself up to the kind of public debate that would have happened in a normal campaign.

■ LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Partisan mudslinging has no place on campus

In response to Thomas Roberts' column on Wednesday, I must say that I am ashamed that a prominent political leader on UK's campus would resort to petty insults and poorly researched accusations.

Beginning with Rep. Harry Moberly and the author's assumption of the presence of a conflict of interest due to his position at Eastern Kentucky University, I would refer him to the Kentucky constitution, which has set up our Legislature in such a way that our senators and representatives are all part-time government employees with full-time jobs in the private sector. One could just as easily attack Republican state Sen. Damon Thayer for his support of equine legislation while working in that industry himself.

That, however, would be wrong, because it is impossible for a conflict of interest not to be possible when legislators have jobs outside of their representative roles. Simply pointing out the possibility of wrongdoing is anything but productive, demonstrating, at best, partisan bickering, and, at worst, libel.

Instead, Roberts' should point out specific circumstances where he can prove that Moberly used his position to the benefit of EKVU in a way that would not improve the Commonwealth of Kentucky as a whole. Roberts is unable to accomplish this, however, because it has not happened.

Roberts' claims regarding Gov. Steve Beshear are also unfair characterizations of the political climate in Frankfort, as much of his loss in popularity has stemmed from budget cuts forced by the deficit left to us from former Republican Gov. Ernie Fletcher.

The bottom line is that the problems faced by Kentucky and this nation cannot be solved by a single party making claims of moral superiority. Both the Democratic and Republican parties contain a wide spectrum of ideas and personalities, and to generalize them and condemn their members solely on the basis of that membership is profoundly irresponsible.

"Arguments" such as these by either a Republican or Democrat have no place in the pages of a newspaper associated with an institute dedicated to higher learning, and I encourage both Thomas Roberts and Robert Kahne to dedicate future columns to political discourse conducive to a stronger and more effective political system instead of dragging this university into a mire of partisanship and short-sighted mudslinging.

What is being privileged? Your Dixie cups may be first sign

Luxury is an interesting word. Its definition varies on whom you ask. It could be an 82-inch plasma flat screen capping off a living room

SEAN ROSE
Kernel columnist

Similar to beauty, luxury is in the eye of the money-holder.

America, even with the dollar's struggles, is still supremely wealthier than the majority of the world. Growing up in a country with such wealth, it's easy not to notice all luxuries we have in our country that are viewed as nothing more than mediocre parts of life.

Take for example those small Dixie paper cups that so many people have sitting next to their bathroom faucet. Are these a luxury?

Most would say no, and when evaluating the material value of the cup, they're probably right. But monetary value is completely different.

A box of those cups costs roughly $5. Consider that some people might buy one box every month. That's $60 spent on nothing but someone's refusal to drink from the faucet after they brush their teeth. True, $60 is not a lot of money (in this country), but consider what it's being spent on: a completely nonessential commodity.

America is lucky enough to have the wealth necessary to sustain a commodity culture, a place where the best ideas come of how to improve our lives in infinitesimal ways while making us all the lazier.

Even in our own country of bounty, there are people forced to beg for the change we throw away at useless commodities. The homeless man in Phoenix Park also probably won't view a paper cup as luxury, but the money that pays for it...

This is not some tirade against the Dixie company, and anyone with a quarter of an open mind and eyes should see this.

Simple luxuries we take for granted, that aren't available for so many, surround us. Cable television. Bottled water. Toilet seat covers. Ice makers. Dish washers. Personal washers and dryers. PlayStations. Coinstans. Indoor groceries. Bowflexes. Fake plants. Microwave ovens. Cars with more horsepower and less fuel economy than we need. Not to mention clean tap water, electricity in every city and laws that require adequate heat in buildings.

And let's not forget the basic and truest luxury there is: life. America has first-rate medical care, a world away from the 27 countries that have life expectancies lower than 50 years, according to the CIA's 2007

World Factbook.

I'm not advocating throwing your paper cups and televisions and microwaves into the street (although there would be more value in that than people realize), but if college students are to be fully educated, they should be aware of their personal place in the world. For Americans, that means recognizing how lucky many of us are.

So many college students don't take the time to explore these thoughts. And the curriculum at UK certainly isn't pushing such discussion, at least not in any widespread way.

The realization of this arbitrary privilege of being born an American should be a requirement of any formal education in this country.

Asking oneself what to do with this wealth and privilege after that can't be forced on a person, but it should be asked.

Look beyond traditional gender roles, recognize feminists among housewives

Housework, stay-at-home mothers and housewives are sticky terms that have divided feminists since Betty

CARRIE BASS
Kernel columnist

Friedan's "The Feminine Mystique" suggested that women might not inherently love their traditional roles as housekeepers and mothers.

Many of you out there might think I am crazy for even bringing this up, but just last week, one of my feminist friends admitted that she only recently learned to cook because she saw avoiding cooking as a rebellion against the domesticity that entrapped her mother. Now she loves to cook and regrets not having those years of extra cooking wisdom.

Not too long ago, I was quick to belittle my aunt, at that time a stay-at-home mom and housewife, for doing "nothing." Flash-forward to my first experience living in an apartment on my own: I no longer believe that housework is "nothing." I think that all of us living on our own can agree, even the smallest amount of housework equals a significant amount of labor.

Armed with the knowledge that cooking, cleaning, laundering and other household chores constitute a significant and essential category of labor, it is easy to see the perspective of those feminists who believe that domestic labor is feminist and that women who choose to stay at home for various reasons are not excluded from being feminist. Another feminist friend of mine hopes to one day be a stay-at-home mom and dedicate time to unpaid charity work.

Who am I to look down my feminist nose at domestic labor or the vastly needed charitable donation of time and energy?

In fact, there are many proponents of giving small governmental stipends to stay-at-home moms and housewives to show that their labor is equally as important as those who labor outside of the home. After all, in saying that housework is feminist, we are recognizing the centuries of unrecognized labor traditionally performed by women as important and at the same time, we give "feminized" labor the same respect as the "masculinized" labor of the outside economy.

Furthermore, recognizing the importance of domestic labor could help to increase cultural respect for the lower class and racial minorities, who to this day continue to do their own housework and perform a significant amount of domestic labor for the more privileged middle and upper classes.

The danger in praising stay-at-home moms and housewives too much is that it reinforces gender roles and gendered spaces.

At the end of the day, stay-at-home moms and housewives are reaping the benefits typically reserved for white, middle-class women and doing nothing to prove that feminized

In saying that housework is feminist, we are recognizing the centuries of unrecognized labor traditionally performed by women as important.

space extends beyond the household. These women are reinforcing gender roles and possibly slowing the pace toward universal gender equality.

Of course, it is highly unlikely that this little article is going to settle any debates over domestic labor, but I sure hope it gets you all thinking or at the very least, makes everybody a little more thankful for the efforts of their moms (and dads, too).

My opinion? There are many feminist housewives out there, but there are far more women staying at home due to patriarchal beliefs. Maybe if there were more stay-at-home dads and househusbands and better-paid domestic employees, we wouldn't even be having this debate at all.

New student group focuses on diversity

By Julian Vachon
jvachon@kykernel.com

UK's campus saw a rise in racial driven conflicts this school year, and a new student organization is looking to help move the campus forward with strategic leadership.

"I think this year was a rough year for campus," said Patrick Nally, a member of the new student organization. "But anytime there's a down year, there's room to grow."

The group's name includes two of its main goals — developing underrepresented students into leaders and leading by example to make UK a more inclusive and open campus, said Nally, a marketing and integrated strategic communications junior.

Another goal includes establishing more trust among students and top administrators, including President Lee Todd and Provost Kumble Subbaswamy, so that when diversity and racism issues arise on campus, the two groups are prepared to work together effectively.

"I don't think communication was very good at all before between students and administrators," said Success representative Wesley Robinson, who also writes for the Kernel. "The administration's silence on issues represented that students weren't working with administrators in relation to diversity and racism."

Concerned students organized under racially motivated events on campus this year, including a racially charged Oct. 5 Kernel cartoon likening UK's Greek system to a slave auction, a racial slur written on a student's dorm room door and an anti-Muslim forwarded e-mail sent out by Student Government President Nick Phelps through an SG Listserv.

For Success representative James Davidson Jr., concerns about racially motivated action on campus made him want to speak out before this year.

In 2005, someone wrote the n-word on his friend's car parked in K-Lot and then later on a dorm room door.

"It's a culmination of injustice and inequality that's happened on campus," said Davidson, an integrated strategic communication senior.

Nally and Robinson said the group is not a programming organization. Instead of hosting its own events, it will work to bring student organizations together and create more cooperation. Some of its initiatives could include starting a Web site, hosting town hall meetings and using events like K-Week to talk with students about opportunities on campus for diversity-related events.

"There are so many groups trying to do good things, but they're all facing different directions," Nally said.

The organization is accepting applications for next year through April 4th and will take 11 members for the 2008-09 school year.

Ryan Murrell, a political science sophomore, said he is thinking of applying to be a Success representative because the group will create leaders whom other students can look up to. Murrell is one of the directors of OUt-source, a student organization that provides a resource center for gays, lesbians, bisexuals, transgressors and questioning students.

"I'm interested because of the work I'm already doing to create an inclusive campus," Murrell said. "It's about changing attitudes."

To apply for a Success representative position, e-mail Nally at panall2@uky.edu or get an application at the Martin Luther King Jr. Cultural Center and the Office of Multicultural Student Affairs.

Gov. Steve Beshear does not plan to remove the statue because Davis is a historical figure who represents part of Kentucky's cultural history, a spokeswoman said.

Student Government President Nick Phelps said his feelings on the statue in the Capitol building resembled how he felt during a controversy two years ago about a 46-foot mural in Memorial Hall depicting the history of Lexington and its surrounding area. The mural, which some said stereotyped American Indians and blacks, was not removed.

"I was not in support of removing the mural, so I would not support removing Jefferson Davis," Phelps said. "I don't think we should remove history. I think it removes the question, 'Who is he?'"

Many students might ask the same question about Davis.

In Kentucky, the Civil War is part of the middle school curriculum. Unless students take an advanced placement history course in high school, that's usually the last time they focus on 19th century American history, said Nayasha Owens-Morton, a U.S. history and African-American history teacher at Bryan Station Traditional High School.

William Campbell has taught a class on Lincoln at UK for about 10 years as an English and honors professor. Students going into his class know little about the confederate president, he said.

"About Jefferson Davis, Kentuckians tend to know that he was from our state, that there's a memorial dedicated to him somewhere in the state, and that he was the president of the Confederacy," Campbell said. "Of Lincoln's writings, most have read only the Gettysburg Address. Of Davis's writings, most have read nothing."

Brief Biography of Jefferson Davis

Jefferson Finis Davis was born June 3, 1808 in what is now Todd County, Ky., as the youngest of 10 children. He went to a Mississippi college in 1818, and to Transylvania University in 1821. The building where he lived in Lexington now houses Bombay Brazer on South Limestone Street.

After graduating from West Point and fighting in the Mexican-American War, Davis was elected as a Mississippi senator. As senator, he announced Mississippi's secession from the Union in 1861. Soon after, he was elected as president of the Confederate States of America, the 11 southern states that seceded from the Union between 1861 and 1865. The Confederacy did not include Davis' home state, Kentucky.

As president, Davis was regarded as a stubborn man who deeply loved the South. However, he was unable to successfully face the industrialized North, and after four years, Confederate General Robert E. Lee surrendered.

Davis fled in 1865, heading west to continue the war in Texas. His wife threw a shawl over him as he fled, and after his capture, he was mocked for disguising himself as a woman. Davis was jailed and charged with treason, although he was never convicted.

After two years of imprisonment, Davis was released. He became president of an insurance company and later wrote a book in an attempt to make money; both enterprises were largely failures. Although he had almost no money in his old age, Davis became a symbol of the Old South, and his funeral was the most widely attended in the South up to that point.

A bicentennial festival celebrating Davis' birth is slated to take place June 7-8 at the Jefferson Davis State Historic Site in Fairview, Ky.

A chart on page 1 of Wednesday's Kernel included the wrong nutrition information for an Arby's Beef 'n Cheddar with medium curly fry. The sandwich and fries together have 842 calories, 44 grams of fat and 90 grams of carbohydrates, according to the Arby's Web site.

The article "One arrest made in Greg Page burglary" in yesterday's Kernel misspelled the hometown of Charles Earl Mason Jr. and Roderick Andre Reese. The two are from Radcliff, Ky.

freshman Sen. Julie Colgate said to have senators re-elected to office is a great advantage to the Senate and student body.

"There are a lot of experienced senators for next year," Colgate said. "That should bring some new ideas and some good, old ideas to the table."

Creating a staff is one of Montell's first priorities once in office, Mills said. When it comes time to make administrative decisions, he said he hopes to keep communicating with students around campus.

"We're going to be listening to students' concerns," Mills said. "We'll make sure the student body is part of any decision we're making."

The pair will be sworn into office in April, but Montell said he plans to start working tomorrow.

"It's time to take these 'what ifs' and turn them into realities," Montell said.
