On The Drinking Driver

Like the problems of prostitution and gambling, the question of what to do about the drinking driver will always continue to exist, a Cleveland, Ohio, judge noted recently.

He is right, in part. So long as laws against drunken driving are no more stringently enforced than those against prostitution and gambling, the intoxicant will continue to be the greatest menace on America's highways.

George C. Lowe of Philadelphia, traffic safety expert for an Eastern oil refining company, has noted the laxity of American jurists and legal codes in dealing with drunken motor-

Speaking before a Cleveland traffic safety group, Mr. Lowe said, "One of the most ridiculous situations was that of a defendant whose drunken driving resulted in the death of a father and two sons. For this he was fined $200. About the same time a man in another state was fined $500 for killing a deer out of season.'

Approximately the same situation exists in Kentucky and many other states. A drunken driver need not even lose his operator's permit in Kentucky. Depending on the judge in the area where the drunken driver is arrested, he may merely be assessed four points on the state point system and fined; some judges may even change the charge to the less serious one of reckless driving.

Such practices are in direct contrast to penalties levied in other countries. In Finland, for instance, a person receives three years in prison if caught driving under the influence of alcohol. If such an offender is involved in a traffic accident, he will be given a six-year sentence.

San Salvador's measures are equalas stringent. A drunken driver involved in a traffic accident there must remain in jail until the persons he has injured are completely well.

We do not urge that measures quite as harsh as those we have cited be adopted, but we do feel a reevaluation of the laws concerning drunken driving are called for. The National Safety Council has estimated that almost one out of every three fatal motor vehicle accidents last year involved a drinking driver. Thus, drinking drivers killed approximately 10,-000 people last year.

Until there is some greater legal compulson to do so, we must all cooperate in keeping the Christmas spirits off the highways.

Draft Ends In Britain

National Service has claimed its last men. After those who entered the forces last week no more are to be called. Thus, when last week's intake emerges in 1962, an unloved institution will end. National Service was necessary, but the gross misuse of conscripts by the Army was not. Many millions of man-hours have been wasted through the complacency and incompetence of the War Office and of lower commands. The Navy and the RAF have not been above reproach in their use of men, but they have never been so irresponsible as parts of the Army.

The training of recruits has been symptomatic of the ills common in the Army's approach. Even when rearmament was most urgent, in the days of the Korean war and of Rhine Army's expansion under General Eisenhower, tank crews were spending seven or eight times as long on drill parades as on the essentials of tank driving or tank gunnery. They were being shipped overseas-and perhaps still are-with boots which shone superbly and with belts blancoed to perfection, but with only a scanty knowledge of the skills that mean life or death in action. Complaints in Parliment and through the press left the War Office unmoved.

Soon the Army is to lose its National Service men. If it had made better use of its men in the past fifteen years the opposition to conscription might have been less strong. But, even if it had done so, this would have remained a costly way to create fightunits. The constant change of men, as new ones come and experienced soldiers depart, diminishes a unit's efficiency. It means that a platoon or crew cannot remain together for long, fully accustomed to working as one. An all-Regular force ought to be more efficient and economical. Whether enough men can be recruited remains to be seen. Also to be answered is the question whether, having so misused the time of many conscripts, the Army will be more competent in training its Regulars. It will be under less scrutiny from outside, and so more prone to its old ideas of "soldiering." MANCHESTER GUARDIAN

Purrhaps Wurr Jest Too Old

Possibly, Mr. I. J. Pitman is right; perhaps a new alphabet with 43 characters, including 23 of the 26 now in use, would help children to learn to read more rapidly. Presumably Mr. Pitman, grandson of the founder of the shorthand method, has given the matter more thought than have we.

But for the life of us, we can't see why the words bone, done, gone, and one are any easier to learn when spelled boen, dun, gon, and wun. And we can't enthuse over a sentence which reads: "An Inglishman landing in Nue York duz not lern a nue spoeken langwaej as a Frenchman wood."

Purrhaps wurr jest too old to appreeshiate progrus.

Waste Of Time

To The Editor:

"To say the least it is unusual for the Kernel to ask a faculty member to review Stylus . . . " Prof. Robert O.

Was it the history and significance of our literary magazine that was to be reviewed (in the Dec. 8 Kernel) or the current issue of the same? In any event, neither received complete attention from the reviewer.

After five paragraphs of "rah, rah" Stylus, we are finally shown facts which cover the prose part of the magazine quite accurately; then, and once he has asserted that "Stylus is better suited for lyric poetry rather than prose," our guide flies over the "better suited for" subject. We are left hungry for his opinions on the matter of poetry, but he excuses himself saying there is not space enough (what about the first five paragraphs of meaningless chatter?)

Once in the art section, the reviewer mentions one by one the publishworks, finally arriving at the photograph of four earthenware pieces by Phillip Harris." We understand that the published object of art was the ceramic work, not the photograph. Could it be that this is a subtle attack on the pots, this ethereal way of ignoring them?

But it is closing time, and I don't feel like abusing the editor's generosity. The job of wasting space has been well taken care of in the review.

GALAOR CARBONELL

Relax, Mr. Morris

To The Editor:

Upon reading the letter to the editor written by Mr. Wes Morris Thursday I was and am deeply concerned. What sort of inane, bigoted, unloyal clod are you to publicly criticize those things that are so near and dear to us, the students of UK?

Are you a beatnik?

To see you bitterly denounce campus culture crushed me, Mr. Morris. Why, boy, look around you and what do you see-culture leaping at you, falling on you, entwining around you. Culture with a capital "C." And you . why, Mr. Morris, how could you? Let me name a few of the magnificient culturous avenues available to you and me here at UK.

We have a marching band that spells "CATS"; we have a theatre in which "real live" plays are produced; we also have four choral groups that perform once a semester anyway; we have an art gallery that houses some of the finest blobs of the day. I'm told; we have the UK basketball team. Furthermore we have a prize-winning four-day-a-week newspaper. Man, what more could you want? I'll bet that you yelled for Tennessee.

Your arguments concerning our student government are childish, Mr. Morris. I, who have not had the opportunity of attending another university, have probably been here longer than you and have found that unless you happen to be one of those individuals who enjoys being punched in the nose it is best not to knock campus politicians publicly. Reserve this for the coffee house for your own safety. And, after all, Mr. Morris, without these leaders on whom you and I depend, who would organize and tend to their many duties such as providing the students with Fats Domino concerts, with student directories, and the annual bike

For shame, Mr. Morris, don't buck the system; incorporate the typical attitude, "To hell with it all," relax, enjoy yourself, or you may find yourself in a terrible position. Someone might ask you to tie the bell around the cat's neck and that might prove embarrising, huh?

Type Gremlins

We offer either our sympathy to the editors of the schedule book for the spring semester for falling victims to the newspaper's bugabooembarrassing typographical errors or our congratulations to the Physical Education Department for broadening its curriculum.

Sympathy is probably appropriate as the new course, PE 120-1, is surely an example of type gremlins at work.

If not, it may become the most popular course at the University.

Now, the dangers of such a recreation of legend probably outweigh its advantages. True, such plays do automatically seem archetypal and hence significant, regardless of how trivial their themes may actually be.

But there are pitfalls inherent.

But there are pitfalls inherent in these same virtues. A very familiar plot lays itself inordinately open to critical scrutiny. The writer must take scrutiny. The
